Short Stories OF THE TOWN

Trespasser Fined $1.

C. S. Fletcher, charged with trespassing on Pisco property, was fined $1 in police court this morning. No other cases reported.

Dr. Cohen to Amber.

Dr. Lawrence L. Cohen will deliver the commencement sermon to the consolidated high school of the Amber district, at Amber, tomorrow afternoon at three o'clock.

Divorce Suit Filed.

Riddle and Hammerly, attorneys, this morning filed in the district court a suit for divorce for Mrs. Ella Osborne vs. A. O. Osborne. The petitioner alleges mistreatment and asks for absolute divorce, for the custody of the child and for a division of the property, amounting to $3,000.

Acting Desk Sergeant.

W. D. Elston has been appointed temporary desk sergeant, supplying the place of Sergeant Looney, who will leave this afternoon on a week's vacation. Sergeant Looney will devote the greater portion of his vacation, it is alleged, to the manufacture of interesting fish stories over in northwestern Oklahoma.

Clean Cemetery Lots.

The cemetery association requests that all lot owners who have failed to clear off their lots so far this spring please do so before Decoration Day. They report that while many owners are taking pride in improving the cemetery, many of the lots are in a regrettable condition and spoil the general attractiveness of the place.

Why Not Socks?

A representative Chickasha business man, with offices on the fourth floor of the First National bank building, asks why this column should devote so much space to latest styles in gentlemen's headwear and say nothing about hosiery—otherwise, socks. The business man stated that on that floor of the bank building could be found the latest shade of lavender in gentlemen's socks. However, when the reporter attempted to run down the story M. S. Cralle became indignant and threatened all kinds of dire things.

Rev. Wray to North Carolina.

Rev. John A. Wray, pastor of the First Baptist church, will leave on the early Monday morning train over the Rock Island, for Asheville, N. C., where he goes to attend the annual meeting of the Southern Baptist convention. Mr. Wray delivers the annual sermon to the graduating class of the Chickasha high school Sunday evening. He has been forced to decline invitations to preach the commencement sermons for three other graduating classes in different cities in Southern Oklahoma on account of having to leave at this time for the convention. Mr. Wray will probably return to Chickasha by the latter part of the next week.

Seeks to Recover From Bondsman.

Attorney R. C. Searcy today filed in the district court a suit in which the town of Tuttle is plaintiff and C. W. Fleener, J. C. Moffett, J. F. Childers, A. J. Davidson, Lant Wood, Stephen Hubbard, M. E. Terry, D. Chitwood, C. O. Beardsley, W. E. Forsythe, are defendants. The suit is filed to recover from the defendants, as bondsmen of James Stephens, the sum of $77.95, the amount of a fine and costs imposed upon Stephens by the town of Tuttle, through its town justice. The fine was imposed in June, 1914; the defendant appealed to the district court; the defendants signed his appeal bond; May 8, 1916, the petition recites, the appeal was dismissed by the court.

GOLFERS MET THEIR WATERLOO YESTERDAY

Quietly, sadly, dodging rather than seeking publicity, the golfers of Chickasha returned last night from their Waterloo on the Oklahoma City links. The match game between the Chickasha warriors of the green and those of the metropolis "happened" Friday afternoon. It resulted, not in a victory for the metropolitans as in a rout for the Chickashans. However, the game was an interesting one, the handicaps of the Chickasha team enabling it to give the Oklahoma City players some stiff competition in nearly every match. D. M. Caviness, with a handicap of 13, and Bob Murray, with a handicap of 12, made the best scores of Chickasha players.

MOLLY'S PLANS

By CATHERINE CRANMER.

"Good morning, family!" was Mollie's cheery greeting as she entered the breakfast room. "Mother, I'm going away for a month. You know it will rain all through March, and rain makes me weep more than the clouds."

"Mollie Ainsworth! Of all the short-sighted creatures, you are the most hopelessly!" Her mother looked disconsolately at the girl as she spoke. "With the most eligible man in town ready to drop at your feet and with the two most attractive debutantes canceling trips to Palm Beach and Aiken for fear you'll capture him while they're gone, you want to go away to escape the March rains."

"Now, mother, dear, you're a jealous, painstaking mother for a debutante, and you're on the job every minute. But come on, family, let's all take a vacation from our several professions."

She included her mother and father in a wheedling glance.

"As for that eligible man—other-wise known as Leslie Morehouse—he's already proposed and I've told him it's too sudden."

"And as sure as you live one of those other girls will catch Leslie Morehouse on the rebound. Oh, I know men!"

"They'll have to catch him on the run instead of on the rebound, I'm thinking," laughed Mollie, "as he is leaving today for parts unannounced on a hunting trip."

"Would you mind telling me what you mean by turning down the catch of the season?" asked her mother, with mock calmness.

"I mean just what I told him, though I softened it a bit, for when I saw him with his society manners off and his heart manners on, he did seem pretty nice." Mollie blushed a bit, but added: "But don't look so solemn, mother. I'm still 'one and twenty with beans a-plenty.' And, daddy, throw down your paper and let's all plan out some nice trip for fun instead of for form. Aiken and Palm Beach are disqualified, for what we need is some secluded spot where we can talk common sense with each other and with our souls and come back home better acquainted."

"That does sound like common sense, and I've got a suggestion to make about where to go." Her father was suddenly enthusiastic. "One of my clients has been after me for years to go out and enjoy the big fireplaces and armchairs and first editions and mountain scenery of his ancestral home that he occupies only about two months in the year."

A few days later they made the proposed trip. After their first evening before a wood fire in a huge fireplace, where all of the family grew reminiscent and sympathetic, and the evening ended with Mollie playing softly on the big piano while all of them joined in singing old folk songs.

As for Mollie, she reveled in the many delights of the big house, the wonderful view from its broad windows and the quaint caretakers. She did not even mind when a drizzly day came. In the afternoon, she put on a long corduroy coat and a fuzzy yellow scarf and cap and went out for a walk.

As she descended a hill toward the tumbling mountain stream she caught a glimpse, through an opening in the trees, of some wild ducks on the water. Very cautiously she went down toward the river bank, but the elusive ducks had sailed around a bend, and to widen her vision she stepped out on the edge of a wet and slippery rock. At sight of her, the ducks first huddled and then rose in graceful flight, but suddenly scattered in confusion as shots cracked from a clump of shrubbery farther up the stream.

Mollie gave a start of surprise at the first shot, lost her balance and with a frightened scream, fell into the water. In her heavy long coat she was unable to make a good stroke and promptly went under. She came up still more frightened as she felt the strong force of the current. She lost consciousness as she went under the second time without noticing that two men were running toward her from where the rifle shots had been heard.

When she regained consciousness she was being carried up the hill by a big, strong man, whose face was not visible to her until, in response to her tired exclamation, he bent over her and she recognized Leslie Morehouse.

"Mollie, dear," he whispered, and Mollie replied with a long sigh of contentment. A half hour later both of them were in dry clothes and sitting before the big fireplace. Mr. and Mrs. Ainsworth left the room to give orders for an early supper and a big fire in the dining-room fireplace, and Morehouse got up and stood behind the high, wing-backed tapestry armchair in which Mollie sat. Then he leaned over and looked into her face, speaking very softly to her.

"Haven't this condensed our acquaintance enough to put us nearer the time when you will give me the answer you withheld the other day?" "Yes," came Mollie's answer, "and I believe that whatever of our society veneer was not washed away by that cold water has been melted by this darling fire."
